

Tips to help your preschool child communicate better

Updated on 11th October 2018 by Emily Finch |

If your little one isn't a big talker compared to their friends, have you ever considered it might be a simple case of poor communication? According to Jaclyn Smith, Learning Vision Curriculum Specialist for Busy Bees Preschool, one of the best things you can do to help your child become an effective communicator is to become a good listener! They share top tips on how you can listen more effectively to help your child get their point across. You never know, it might also lead to less tantrums!

Circle Time uses songs, rhymes and finger plays, stories and familiar objects or items of interest as the platform for engaging children in verbal communication, self-expressions and exploring feelings and social interactions and relationships

1. Play along

Using the child's lead, learn to improvise, play along and chat with your child; even if you're talking about flying green sheep! For effective communication, experts say when any information is received from a partner, it's essential to first accept it as a fact, regardless of how illogical or nonsensical it may appear at face value, then add and contribute to that information. This practise is especially relevant to conversations with children...as they might want to talk about topics that initially make no sense!

Hands@Work, a hands-on learning, child-centred and exploratory curriculum that actively engages children in exploring with different art media, tactile and sensory materials to develop children's motor abilities and eye-hand coordination

2. Accept Information

Children tend to share thoughts and ideas, based on a creative expression, an idea or a fantasy. Regardless of how different their responses or ideas vary from our expectations or logic, it's important to accept, acknowledge, affirm and then slowly scaffold those views. It's helpful for us to re-think the way we socialise with children. Instead of belittling or trying to change their ideas in discussion, it's sometimes more meaningful to simply play along and enjoy the experience of sharing information, rather than focussing solely on the content of the conversation.

According to Jaclyn Smith, Learning Vision Curriculum Specialist for Busy Bees Preschool, one of the best things you can do to help your child become an effective communicator is to become a good listener!

4. Allow Strong Personal Opinions

Encourage children to share their own unique opinions and provide them with as many opportunities to explore and experiment with language.

Encourage your child to re-tell stories, share familiar narratives, and share personal thoughts and feelings about experiences they've had. The day-to-day routine of activities and conversations encourages children to form opinions and thoughts on things that are relevant and meaningful to them. Engaging children in the decision-making process also plays a significant role in supporting the development of children as confident communicators, as they learn to recognise that their views and opinions matter.

Enhancement to the early years curriculum includes Rhythm 'N' Moves, GymWorks, PlayWorks and EQ Literacy which provide essential experiences in promoting a total curriculum and serves as the foundation for later intellectual development.

5. Book a spot on Busy Bee Preschool's Learning Vision Linguistics and Communication Discovery Workshop (<https://expatliving.sg/events/Linguistics-and-Communication-Discovery-Workshop-140244.ece>)

Designed to help parents better understand their child's language milestones and what they can do to encourage good communication skills. Parents will get to observe their child respond to the tailored child-directed one hour workshop. They will be a part of a guided interactive session designed to promote linguistics and communication abilities.

During the session, parents will have the chance to discover and analyse their child's natural strengths, together with the preschool's curriculum experts. Since it's a tailored workshop, parents will be asked to send in three questions they have about linguistics and communication prior to the workshop. Their questions will be answered during the workshop.
